Roman Sokolov began his studies of visual arts at 13.
In the first year on the Faculty of Photojournalism he became a photographer for TimeOut Petersburg magazine and got surrounded by the city's cultural life.

For a long time, Roman considered personal photography as an unconscious way to express his feelings and emotions. His continuous work with different artists greatly influenced and changed forms of the understanding of his own photography.

The ecology of mind as well as the connection of a man with the city and nature became the main theme of his photography. He combines reportage, documentary and art photography to make discoveries.

Learning from worldwide photographers, getting to know their life experiences and outlooks, Roman also began to understand psychology as a main component of photography. Since then psychology became the one thing that captures the artist's great attention during his photography process and stays portrayed on his works.
